☐September 1, 1939☐ was written by W.H. Auden as WWII was beginning. It was published in 1939 in

The New Republic, then later in Auden's collection Another Time. It was intentionally structured to mimic the format used by Yeats in his famous poem ☐Easter, 1916☐. Just like Yeats' work, Auden's discusses an important historical event. The first parts of the poem speak the failures playing out on the world stage, and the second alludes to something more hopeful in the future.

Letters from Iceland (1937) is a hybrid book, produced in collaboration with Louis MacNeice. The poem "Spain, 1937" which he later rejected as "dishonest" draws on experiences of the Spanish Civil War. "September 1, 1939" marks the outbreak of the Second World War, the duration of which Auden spent in America.

~~W H Auden~~ The British Library The British Library

In his W.H. Auden as a Social Poet, Frederick Buell identified the roots of this terse style in the private, codified language in which Auden and his circle of schoolboy friends conversed. Buell quoted Christopher Isherwood, one of those friends and later a collaborator with Auden, who described a typical conversation between two members of the group: "We were each other's ideal audience ..."
